Good afternoon –

I think that you would have to discuss the situation directly with the subject to validate and document that the adverse event actually occurred. I don't think you can solely rely on the social media posting.

Please see the web links and guidances below that discuss FDA's view on social media.

Office of GCP,

Please provide insights on the following scenario. If an employee or contractor of a pharmaceutical company becomes aware of an adverse event through social media (that is not affiliated with the pharmaceutical company) what is the FDA's expectations regarding reporting the AE. For example if an employee sees the following post on Facebook "Last night my friend took [redacted] and then started vomiting immediately afterwards, it was disgusting!" how would the FDA expect the employee to proceed.

Thank you in advance for any information you can provide.
